According to the complaint, STCL not only changed its name to something “confusingly similar,” but it also adopted a red and white color scheme on its new website that resembles UH’s “cougar red” and white, the official colors of UH. According to STCL officials, the search for a new name began four years ago. And although STCL has not answered the complaint, STCL has commented to the media that they believe they are on “firm legal ground” with the name change. Should the name change hold, Houston won’t be the first city with two similarly named law schools. New York University School of Law and New York Law School have coexisted for 125 years about a mile apart in Manhattan.
